

The Detox Phases

The Preparation Phase

The first phase is the Preparation Phase. This should occur for roughly 7 days and up to two weeks before Phase One begins. This is where you'll be incorporating daily eating habits that will prepare your body to especially support detox Phase Three. You will also be preparing your body by cutting out alcohol, processed sugars, processed food, caffeine (and also smoking) from your diet. You will be developing a habit of drinking at least half gallon of water daily and incorporating lots of probiotic-rich foods in your diet. It is imperative that preparation is done first. Otherwise, you will run a high risk recirculating toxic waste back into your system.

The entire purpose of the Preparation Phase is to stabilize your body, get your pathways open and get things moving. You should be having 1-3 healthy bowel movements every single day. Solid. Not runny or pebbly. See the stool chart below. If you are not experiencing healthy stools as you progress through your Preparation Phase, then it is not time to move to Phase One. You need to stick to the Preparation Phase until you have healthy bowel movements at least once per day.

During the Preparation Phase, focus on your leafy greens, cruciferous veggies, fiber-rich and probiotic-rich foods, fruits (not berries yet), healthy fats, and hydration. This phase is meant to help you develop healthy habits so you can successfully continue through the upcoming phases. It allows you to adjust to drinking more water, improve your bile flow and bowel movements, and reduce sugar cravings and unhealthy habits and food addictions.

Pay close attention to your bowel movements. Remember, you're aiming to have 1-3 healthy stools per day. You should not have to force it. Reference the stool chart below.

Once your detox pathways are opened up and you're having healthy bowel movements that are not forced, it's time to graduate to Phase One.
